SUMMARY

James is experiencing difficulty balancing environmental studies coursework with personal and political interests.

KEY CONCERNS

- He's doing well academically but is finding it harder to connect with environmental and social studies coursework
- Political and social climate is heating up, making it harder to separate between academic content and real-world issues
- I'm still working on understanding which environmental studies courses are relevant for my future
- Difficulty in balancing academic work with personal and political interests

ACTION PLAN

- Help James identify which environmental studies and social justice courses are relevant for graduate school and beyond
- Ensure James is aware of the political and social climate's impact on environmental issues and how to address both academic and real-world concerns
- Recommend James explore non-major options that combine environmental studies and social justice, like the Environmental Justice and Sustainability major
- Regular check-ins to monitor progress and ensure academic balance is being maintained

FOLLOW UP PLAN

- Schedule a check-in after finals week to assess how James is integrating political and environmental issues
- Offer to provide academic support through graduate school application processes
- Encourage James to join student organizations that address environmental and social justice issues
